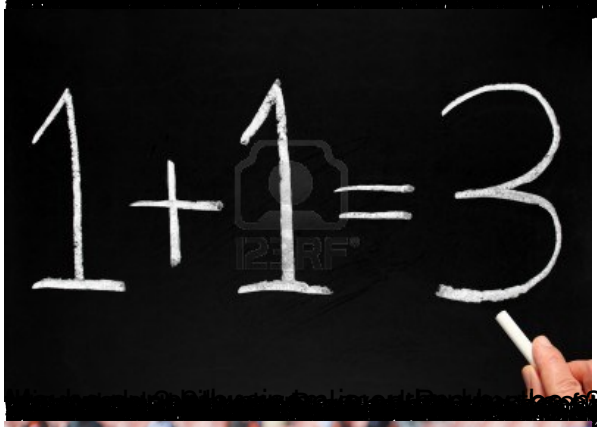
We aren't supposed to be picky about certain things, I get it. We aren't supposed to look a gift horse in the mouth. We play the hand we're dealt, and when something should be perceived as good in any context, we need not spoil the party.

The Cleveland Browns defeated the Pittsburgh Steelers on Sunday, and that statement feels good, all by itself.

It would be great to say it again and again, condensing and limiting history to one wonderful afternoon, the day "we" beat the Steelers.

A lot of people don't like it when the fans say "we", I included sometimes, but these otherwise meaningless Browns wins over the Steelers do belong to the long-suffering Browns fans. If you're new to this whole thing, all Browns fans are long-suffering because they have to own the history since 1965, regardless of when they got on board.

I know we have guys like Bernie Kosar, Hanford Dixon, and Doug Dieken that have made themselves a part of this thing, but it was the fans that dealt with 1996, 1997, and 1998, and it's the fans that will be dealing with any anguish that the team deals them after every player on the current 53-man roster is gone.



1+1=3