Nine players from Ohio State's 2010-2011 team attended the NFL Combine this year, and with the grand spectacle coming to a close earlier this week, we can now look back and see how each former Buckeye performed. Each player was put through a number of physical and mental tests ranging from running 40 yards as fast as they can to fielding questions from an army of media-zombies*. Regardless of your feelings toward the combine, whether you think it's pointless or pivotal, how these NFL hopefuls perform can dramatically alter their perceived value to a professional football team.

 Can you imagine if each player was interviewed by an actual army of zombies? Think about it -- navigating a room full of curios zombies who want nothing more than to feed on your flesh would test the mental strength of a player more than any other situation could. Why don't they do this? Who decides what these players have to go through during combine week? Because that person clearly messed up by excluding the zombie Q&A session.*

This is a brief overview of how the nine former Buckeyes fared at the combine. After reviewing each players work-out results, I'll reveal a picture of former Hollywood star James Van Der Beek that reflects whether the player improved, hurt, or did nothing to their draft value. Here's how it'll work:

He'll be the next Kenny Lofton before he becomes the next Darrelle Revis.
