The best thing about being a pretty bad football team is draft day. Not only is it typically the best day of the year for your fans who treat it like Christmas morning, but there are so many holes on both sides of the ball that it's almost impossible to make a mistake in picking a position to upgrade.

Oh sure, you can certainly still select the wrong guy at the right position (Gerard Warren over Richard Seymour, Courtney Brown over pretty much anyone) but you truly have the luxury of picking the very best player available regardless of what position he plays.

That's one reason I'm looking to forward to draft day in April. The Browns are likely to have the pick of the litter at one spot or another. If DTs go off the boards quickly the Browns still have the option to take a WR like AJ Green or a linebacker like Von Miller. If those two guys are gone then the Browns are likely to get a crack at a DE like Robert Quinn, Marcell Dareus or Da'Quan Bowers.

[redacted]

[redacted]